Just before and during World War I, a number of white musicians came to Chicago from New Orleans playing in an idiom they had learn from blacks in that city . Five of them formed what eventually became known as Original Dixieland Band. They moved to New York in 1917 and won fame there. (46).....

The first important recording by black musicians was made in Chicago in 1923 by King Oliver's creole Jazz Band, (47), including trumpet player Louis Armstrong. Armstrong's dynamic trumpet style became famous worldwide. Other band members had played in Fate Marable's band, which travel up and down the Mississippi River entertaining passengers on riverboats.

The characteristics of this early types of jazz, (48), included a complex interweaving of melodic lines among the coronet or trumpet, clarinet and trombone, and a steady chomp- chomp beat provided by the rhythm section, which include the piano, bass and drums. Most bands used no written notations, preferring arrangements agreed on verbally.

Improvisation was an indispensable element. Even bandleaders such as Duke Ellington, (49), permitted them plenty of freedom to improvise when playing solos.

In the late 1920s, the most influential jazz artists in Chicago were members of small bands such as the Wolverines. In New York, the trend toward larger groups. (50)..... Bands would become larger still during the next age of jazz, the Swing era.
