II - Read the following passage and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the correct word or phrase that best fits each of the numbered blanks from 44 to 50

Over the last few decades, as scientists have intensified their studies of the human effects on climate and of the effects of climate change on humans, a common theme has emerged: in both respects, the world is a very unequal place.

In almost every instance, the people most at risk from climate change live in countries that have contributed least to the atmospheric build-up of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gasses linked to the recent warming of the planet. Those most vulnerable countries tend to be the poorest. And the countries that face the least harm –and are the best equipped to deal with the harm they do face– tend to be the richest.

The large industrialised countries are more resilient partly because of geography; they are mostly in mid-latitude regions with Goldilocks climates –neither too hot nor too cold. But a bigger factor is their wealth – wealth built at least partly on a century or more of burning coal, oil and other fossil fuels that underlie their mobile, industrial, climate controlled way of life.

“We have an obligation to help countries prepare for the climate changes that we are largely responsible for,” said Peter Gleick, a co-founder of the Pacific Institute for Studies in Development, Environment and Security in Berkeley, California.

Around the world, there are abundant examples of how wealth is already enabling some countries to defend themselves against climate and coastal risks, while poverty, geography and history are placing some of the world's most crowded, vulnerable regions directly in harm's way.
