One of the things that he loved most about this course was that he could have access to various texts from different countries and cultures. Dealing with Peer Pressure: What I Learned

Peer pressure is something that many people, including me, have felt at some time in their lives. When I was a teenager, I often experienced pressure from my friends and classmates. This pressure was about doing things like trying new activities, dressing in a certain way, or acting in a specific manner.

Sometimes, this pressure made me do things I didn't really want to do. For example, I joined in on activities or wore clothes just because I wanted to fit in with my friends. Later, I felt sorry for making these choices because they did not match who I really was.

As I got older, I learned how to handle peer pressure better. I started to focus on making choices that matched my own values and goals. I realized that it was important to be true to myself and not just follow what others wanted me to do.

These experiences taught me important lessons. I learned how to be independent, have self-confidence, and choose friends who support and respect me. I also learned that it's okay to be different and that staying true to myself is more important than fitting in with the crowd.
