Every summer, many students at Hoa's school buy new uniforms. The old ones are often still good. Hoa and her friends decided to open a uniform corner so families could pass these clothes to younger students.

Parents donate uniforms that their children no longer need. Hoa checks the sizes and puts a label on each shirt. Other volunteers wash the clothes before placing them on shelves. They want everything to be clean and ready to wear.

The corner opens on two mornings before the new school year. Families can choose the sizes they need. They can take a uniform home without paying for it. A teacher helps when someone cannot find the right size.

Hoa is happy because the project saves money and reduces waste. This year, she wants to add a shelf for school bags. She says that a small place can make a big difference when people work together.
